MR. DIGOFF BUILDS A HENCOOP.

Did you ever try to build a hen-coop?

This may appear to be a very funny question at this stage of the campaign, but Mr. Digoff, a near neighbor of ours, built one a few days ago.

Mr. Digoff owns a yard about forty feet long by twenty wide, and being fond of rural pursuits he determined to have some chickens. On Wednesday last he purchased six—a gentleman and five females.

Of course he couldn't keep them in his cellar, and he started off to the sawmill and bought a bundle of lath and three boards. When they arrived he took off his coat, armed himself with a hammer and saw, and went to work. He nailed a board to the clothes pole, and had placed a strip of wood along the back fence, when a woman stuck her head out of a next-door window, and asked:

"What are you making, Mr. Dig-off?"

In turning around to answer her he nearly knocked his ear off with the hammer, but he managed to answer:

"A chicken-coop."

"Oh!" and down went the window.

As he was sawing a board into slices another neighbor asked what he was constructing. Mr. Digoff responded: "A chicken-coop," and in doing so took a piece off his thumb.

As it was almost completed a man looked over the back fence and asked him what he was making:

"A chicken-coop," answered Mr.

Digoff, and he was so mad that he threw the hammer down and it struck him on the toe with great vehemence.

By this time all the windows in the neighborhood were open, and over twenty people witnessed the show without paying, and were making suggestions.

"What kind of a door are you going to put on it?" asked the man on the fence, "swinging or sliding?"

"Swinging."

"I wouldn't. Leather hinges won't hold, and you can't fasten iron ones to them lath."

"If you don't put weather-strips over them cracks the water'll get in and drown the chickens," suggested the woman next door.

The woman upstairs wanted to know how he was going to fasten a roost up.

"I'd put straw in the bottom for them to sleep in, in the winter," remarked a man from the roof.

"I've heard that they laid best in band boxes
